DELAFIELD - Bonnie Wagner of Hartland has decided to enter the world of permanent cosmetics and have permanent eyeliner applied.

"My aunt had it done years ago and she really loved it," says Wagner. "And I didn't really think about it until I saw Lynn again."

Her friend, Lynn Duncan, of Lynn Duncan's Permanent Cosmetics in Delafield, has her eyeliner done in permanent makeup. The procedure is similar to that of getting a tattoo but the ink is different than tattoo ink and the skin is numbed so the procedure is pain-free.

"Bonnie knows that I am a makeup artist so she's going to let me make all the decisions," Duncan says. "Anybody can do permanent makeup but it really needs to look flattering and not everybody can do that if they're not a makeup artist."

Wagner reclines in a dentist-like chair.

"Bonnie, I have an idea. What about midnight blue?" asks Duncan. "Midnight blue would not be too harsh. It looks blackish. It will give you the definition without the harshness."

Wagner agrees. "I'm really trusting her," says Wagner. "This is permanent."

Duncan begins by applying a cream anesthesia around the eyelids. She waits for the eyes to numb and begins the procedure.

Duncan informs Wagner that the ink initially appears darker and that the color will fade to about half the darkness after a week. She holds Wagner's eyelids closed as she works.

"I feel nothing," says Wagner. "It tickles."

As the line is tattooed, saline is applied over the area and anesthesia is reapplied.

"Look straight into my eyes," says Duncan. "It's looking good."

Duncan asks if Wagner can feel anything because she could numb the area more. Though Wagner isn't feeling any pain, Duncan decides to numb the area again.

"We'll stay ahead of the pain," she says.

Duncan continues to tattoo and rinse the area. Since more ink can be added later, Duncan decides to keep the lower liner thin.

"Keep your eyes closed," says Duncan. "I'm numbing your uppers a little more."

She continues the process until it's complete and Wagner is given a mirror to look at her new eyeliner.

"Oh, that looks nice," says Wagner. "No more marker. That looks great."
